The Giving and the Doing

There are three degrees of charity: giving, doing, and being. The lowest order is giving – anyone with some surplus funds can give to make himself feel better or to assuage a guilty conscience.

Doing is a step upward on the run of charity. It involves time and effort, and not merely the writing of a check. Here too, however, some people use their charitable work for selfish motives that quite cancel out the good they try to do.

Being is the last and hardest stage of charity. Few of us ever achieve it – for it is a deeply rooted attitude of mind and spirit that permeates our whole approach to people and goes far beyond doing volunteer work and making contributions to dinners and benefits.

Harsh though it sounds, I would suggest that without the last stage the first two stages are almost meaningless and futile in the long run. The giving and the doing are social opportunities; only the being can make us want to get to the causes of social evil and to wipe them out – not as a sentimental or humanitarian gesture, but because we feel genuinely involved in the life of mankind.

It is an interesting commentary that what we call “charity” today has become almost completely divorced from the idea of lone; charity is an organized effort to help certain groups of people, through fund raising banquets, benefits, theater parties, bazaars and such social events.

Glen L. Rudd Family Service Project

Join the Glen L. Rudd family as we collect food and hygiene items for local school pantries. Many students in our school system do not have enough to eat, access to clean clothes, or a place to shower. We are collecting quick snacks (granola bars, pudding cups, fruit roll ups etc.) and hygiene items (shampoo, toothbrushes, and toothpaste etc.). If you would like to donate please contact dave@glenrudd.org or donate directly to a local school pantry in your neighborhood.
